In the vapor of the arc, though, the negative were the faster. This may be clue to a falling off in speed as the positive go farther and farther from the center. So far only the most rapid ions of each class had been compared. But when the slower ions were considered the following results were obtained: (1) ions. (2) ions. The performer of these experiments then turns his attention to the discharge of hot platinum wires and of hot carbon and concludes that particles are emanated from the platinum and carbon. These particles when settling upon the negative ions retard their motion. His researches led to the belief also that the process of ionization may begin within the metal or the carbon itself. Perhaps occluded gases have something to do with it, and the arc in partial vacua also...
