Excerpt: . . . perpendicular wire beside the door; one of my recollections of a visit to the home of Benjamin Disraeli at Hughenden in Buckinghamshire was just the style of door bell Fig. 20. South side of Chestnut below Fifth Street; the fashionable shopping section in 1850. noted. There are descriptions of the Norris home, the method of supplying it with water by hydraulic system, with splendid furniture and decorations, but too voluminous for the present occasion. A descendant, Joseph Parker Norris, who died within a year or two was my class-mate at the classical Institute of Dr. John W. Faires on Dean street above Spruce now the building occupied by Rau, the photographer. (Fig. 19.) The Norris family owned considerable property in and about Philadelphia; the founder of the family purchased a large tract now called Norristown being so named after him. The original...
