Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Chinese Phonology: An Attempt to Discover the Sounds of the Ancient Language and to Recover the Lost Rhymes of China The publication of this essay is mainly due to the encouragement of Mr. A. von Rosthorn: during a discussion on the second series of Rhyme-Tables contained in the introduction of K ang-hsi s Dictionary, I communicated certain views which I had long held on an obscure point in those important tables. My opinions were considered by Mr. von Rosthorn of sufficient importance to induce me to undertake an exhaustive enquiry on the different dialects of China with the material industriously collected by Mr. Parker and inserted in Mr. Giles Dictionary. The first results of my studies are contained in the following pages. I have carried on my investigation on a novel plan, but if philology is one of the Natural Sciences, it cannot be excepted from the general treatment accorded to the class: the collection of numerous specimens and their comparison, with the application of mathematics (at least in the elementary form of statistics) become indispensable for the discovery of general laws underlying phenomena.
